Chris, I have this nagging pain that won't go away ever since you've passed away. Everything is reminding me of you. Running out of ice in the fridge, Adele, Sundays, the empty chair next to me every Sunday, leftovers, sunsets, the sky, your dog. Every. Little. Thing. I can't help but blame myself for this. Its been 9 months without you and it still feels like a blur to me. The day before you went to the hospital still feels like yesterday and that night you died still replays in my head. It's a nightmare i just can't escape. the funeral creeps inside my head every now and then. going to school after the funeral was the worst. i keep telling myself that you're in your bed, asleep. but then something reminds me that you're really gone and reality hits. hard. anytime im having a bad morning, all i have to do is look at the sky because you never fail to amaze me with how beautiful you paint the sky. Chris i miss you more than anything would be able to express. i love you sweet boy and fly high. higher than anyone else in the sky. rest easy my love. until we see each other again i'll keep talking at the sky to you. i miss you.

“ how on earth has it been a full year without my brother. it literally feels like yesterday he was at the house. when i told him i would see him next weekend, but instead of seeing him at the house, i saw him in the casket. feels like yesterday we got the call. when he died. when i was sitting front row at his funeral. everything still replays in my head. and here we are. a year later. the memories with him flood my head. the nights when EVERYTHING comes back to me and i just can't help but cry. im so unbelievably proud of him for even living as long as he did. it was rough but he did it. i was so angry with him at first bc if he would've let someone help him he would possibly still be here. then i realized he is so much happier and not in pain anymore. chris, i will forever love you so much. you were an amazing brother and you always made sure everyone around you felt loved. please continue to paint the skies beautifully and rest easy. fly high sweet boy. i will always love you.
