“ I remember stepping into his shop for the first time. I decided to stop by after looking at his Facebook page, wanting to check out the shop. He was tattooing someone at the time and he let me watch as he finished. After he wrapped them up and they left, him and I talked about what I'd want for a first tattoo and I could tell he was excited. I told him I wanted a memorial piece for my grandmother. I made sure to mention though that I wasn't sure when I'd be able to book a spot and he didn't mind. After exchanging messages and giving him a reference on placement, my mom surprised me and said she'd pay for my first tattoo for Christmas that year. Before I knew it, I was in his shop again and about to get tattooed. He made my first tattoo experience so awesome. He was so excited and I just fed off his energy. He made sure I was comfortable and let me have a few breaks. I'm so so happy I chose him to do my first tattoo. I even showed him my artwork after and he said he really liked it. I actually would've loved to have become his apprentice. We even talked about it and I was meant to stop by his shop again. I was going through a lot, struggling with my demons and never got the chance to see him again. Little did I know he was struggling too. I hate it, but I kept putting it off too because part of me didn't think I had what it takes to become a tattoo artist. I thought I had more time to stop by though. Sending lots of love to his family and close friends during this difficult time.
