“ I used to walk down the hill to Nanny’s house. This was a regular ritual for me as a child. I’d walk through the yard and then a bit of woods and then down the terraces of the “field.” I’d stroll in the back yard of Nanny’s house over a little drainage ditch, walk up to the door on the side of the house next to the carport. I’d rarely knock, but would open the door and call out “Nanny.” She’d usually respond “yeah, son.” And then we’d have a day of adventures, fixing little things around the house, saying limbs off a tree in the yard... imagining things out back. And almost always ending up on the screened porch in the front eating sliced tomatoes and onions or cornbread mashed in buttermilk.

I have few memories as a human being that are more clear or more poignant or more joyful than sitting on that porch with my Nanny.

I love you, Nanny. I’ll miss you until I walk with you again in Heaven.
